SEATTLE—Seattle Opera closes its 2022/23 season with the West Coast premiere of Bound, a new chamber opera from composer Huang Ruo and librettist Bao-Long Chu that premiered at Houston Grand Opera in 2014.

Based on true events, Bound tells the story of Diane Tran, a 17-year-old Texas honor student who spent a night in jail for truancy after missing school to work two jobs in support of her family. The child of Vietnamese immigrants, Tran finds herself caught between competing obligations to her family, her schooling, and herself. Over the course of Tran’s sleepless night in prison, Bound explores the struggles common among many first- and second-generation Asian American immigrants trying to make lives for themselves in the United States.

Chinese-born composer Huang Ruo was drawn to Diane’s story for its stark illustration of how such contradictory expectations force many immigrants to make impossible choices in a society that is stacked against them. “I wanted to use opera as the platform to tell a human story, a true story about young Asian Americans and their struggles in America today,” said Huang. “I am very interested in Asian American stories not only because of my own cultural background, but also because of these experiences of young second-generation Asian Americans who were born and raised in America. Bound explores how these young people are often pulled between competing duties: to their schoolwork, to provide for their families, and to the harsh realities of life. It’s a vivid reflection of American society.”

For Taiwanese-born American director Desdemona Chiang, Bound is a model for self-actualization in the face of oppressive structures. “I’m really interested in stories about people who have to survive inside systems, whether it’s a family system, a financial system, or a sociopolitical system,” said Chiang, a stalwart on the Seattle theater scene whose adaptation of Amy Tan’s The Bonesetter’s Daughter premiered at Book-It Repertory Theatre in July 2022. “In Diane’s case, it’s clear the system is flawed, because even though she technically broke the law, she had really done nothing morally wrong. So by the end, Diane has to find a way to liberate herself from all these competing burdens—to detach herself from her mother’s legacy as well as from this ‘crime’ that she’s committed—and to strive to be accountable for her own life.”

Karen Vuong plays the role of Diane Tran, a role she hopes will bring broader awareness to the oppressive structures faced by many second-generation immigrants. “Diane Tran’s story highlights the lack of humanity in many of our social systems,” said Vuong, who last appeared at Seattle Opera as Mimi in La bohème (’21). “We must make room for stories like Diane’s, so I feel a deep sense of responsibility in telling her story to increase its reach and relatability to audiences at large.”

Joining Vuong in the cast are mezzo-soprano Nina Yoshida Nelsen (Hiroko Kobayashi, An American Dream, ‘17) as Khanh and bass-baritone Daniel Klein in his Seattle Opera debut as Stanley/Judge Moriarty. The creative team includes scenic designer Carey Wong (Orpheus and Eurydice, ’22), costume designer Deborah Trout (A Thousand Splendid Suns, ’23), and lighting designer Geoff Korf in his Seattle Opera debut.

Bound is conducted by composer Huang Ruo, leading an instrumental ensemble that features two Vietnamese instruments: the đàn bầu and đàn tranh, both played by Emmy Award-winning composer and multi-instrumentalist Vân-Ánh Vanessa Võ.

Special events for Bound include post-show talkbacks after every performance, each with members of a different Seattle-based Asian American support or cultural organization. Talkbacks will address themes raised by the production and explore how those issues have impacted Seattle’s youth and Asian American communities. Additionally, the performance on Friday, June 16, is Teen Night. Admission to that performance is reserved for groups of teens, teens with a parent/guardian, or school groups, and all tickets for teens are $15.
