Wagner returns to McCaw Hall with Tristan and Isolde

Seattle Opera favorite Mary Elizabeth Williams makes role debut as Isolde

Fantasy-inspired Argentinian production highlights rich South American opera tradition

Plus, events at the Opera Center offer new insights into renowned work

SEATTLE—Seattle Opera continues its 2022/23 season with Richard Wagner’s sensual epic, Tristan and Isolde. Building on the proud tradition of Wagner productions in Seattle, Tristan and Isolde brings Wagner to the McCaw Hall stage for the first time since 2016.

Mary Elizabeth Williams, a longtime Seattle Opera favorite, makes her role debut as Isolde, marking a major foray into new Wagnerian repertoire. Williams, who first sang at Seattle Opera as a Young Artist in the 2000/01 season, appeared most recently as Serena in Porgy and Bess (18), where The Seattle Times proclaimed she had “stolen the show.”

For Williams, debuting this role in Seattle has been an opportunity to reflect on her history with the company. “Seattle Opera has been so many things for me during my career: an incubator, a launching pad, a refiner,” says Williams. “It is only fitting that I would begin my Wagner journey in Seattle. I am overflowing with gratitude.

Joining Williams is world-renowned heldentenor Stefan Vinke, who made headlines at Seattle Opera as Siegfried in the 2013 Ring cycle. Internationally recognized Wagnerian soprano Amber Wagner makes her Seattle Opera debut as Brangäne, alongside Ryan McKinney as Kurwenal, Morris Robinson as King Marke, and Viktor Antipenko in his Seattle Opera debut as Melot. Heidi Melton will fill the role of Isolde in the October 23 performance. At the helm is Jordan de Souza, part of the “new generation” leading the international conducting scene (The New York Times).

The production comes to Seattle from the Teatro Argentino de la Plata outside Buenos Aires, Argentina. Stage director Marcelo Lombardero seeks to highlight the opera’s internal dimensions with his production: “I opted for a visual framework inspired by the style of fantasy comic book illustrations,” says Lombardero. “Utilizing projected drawings, videography, and animation, the scenic design creates an intentionally un-realistic style that combines elements from the Middle Ages, the Romantic period, and our own time. It is a style that involves the audience in the inner journey of these two unfortunate lovers through music, image, and drama.”

Seattle Opera General Director Christina Scheppelmann hopes this production will give Seattle audiences a taste of the rich, extensive opera tradition in South America. “Some of the great opera houses of South America predate those in the United States, and that long tradition has fostered great creativity and imagination,” says Scheppelmann. “This production uses a generous palette of colors and images that, in conjunction with Wagner’s irresistibly powerful music, produces an intensely emotional experience.”

Tristan and Isolde runs October 15–29 at McCaw Hall, with tickets starting at $35. More information at seattleopera.org/tristan. Plus, get a sneak peek with a live feed of a working rehearsal of Tristan and Isolde, broadcast at Seattle Opera’s Open House on Saturday, September 24, from 1–4 PM at the Opera Center.

Rounding out the fall, the Opera Center hosts learning opportunities, recitals, and behind-the-scenes exhibits to enhance the experience of Tristan and Isolde:
